Evaluating Internet Sources

The World Wide Web can be searched by a specific address (the URL, uniform resource locator) or by using one of the many good search engines available such as Bing, DuckDuckGo, Northern Light, Excite, Lycos, Yahoo, MetaCrawler, Google and ScholarGoogle.

As you prepare to research on the Internet, please remember that the WWW is much like a giant broadcast service that has no central authority. Many people believe that if information is on the Internet, it must be true. However, anyone with a server can make information available through a Home or Web page! Therefore, your information will be as reliable (or unreliable) as its source.

When you are trying to discern what constitutes a good website, ask the four basic "W's":

- Who wrote it?
- What are they saying?
- When was this created or revised?
- Where is the site located?

Is this source Reliable? Check the domain name in the address

- .edu=educational institution (but does it give a disclaimer?)
- .gov=government agency
- .com=commercial enterprise (designated to sell a product or service)

Is it Authoritative?

- Does it reflect an individual's opinion? (Hint: a tilde "~" in the address usually means that an individual is the source)
- What is the author's motive?
- Is he or she well known or considered an authority? Are any credentials noted?

Is the source Current?

- When was it posted or updated?
- What are the inclusive dates of the information?

Is the source Complete?

- Is this information the most thorough that is available?
- Has the author taken an excerpt from or summarized another source?

Is this information Relevant?

Does this information really fit my needs?

*The Internet will not be your BEST source for ALL research. Don't let attraction to the Internet sway your choice of sources!
